In this multifocal reading of Erec et Enide by Chrétien de Troyes, I consider recurrent thematic, structural, and stylistic patterns in Chrétien's earliest-known narrative in order to show that in his first major work the author was cultivating both a medium and a public for vernacular romance. The emphasis is ultimately on what could be called the "anthropology" of medieval narrative, in order to develop a comprehensive understanding of a culturally complex literary work of the later twelfth century.
